Author: Maureen Miller

Smith agrees to construct a building addition for Jones that is to match the roofline of the existing building, so that there will be a seamless flow from the original building to the addition. Jones discovers after the construction is complete, and winter has set in, that there are icing problems, because the addition does not match the roofline--it is several inches off. A court would likely hold that Smith's failure to align the roofline would discharge Jones from any obligation to pay Smith the last construction payment due.
